

Abstract

This thesis looks at the methods used in the creation of a digital elevation model for the Badia region of Jordan; the extraction of geomorphological information from the model; and the use of remotely sensed imagery to aid in the subsequent analysis. Problems that were encountered are discussed, and suggestions made for future work on the same subject.